

Some SetSchedule customers express concerns over lead quality, service

On Tuesday, Inman published a review of SetSchedule, a data-driven lead generation and sales support company for real estate agents that just launched a mobile app. After the article went live, Inman received two highly critical claims in the comments from readers that SetSchedule was not delivering on its word to users, prompting Inman to look deeper into the product and its founder.

It's not uncommon for some readers to share a negative experience with a technology product, but the criticism regarding the company's lead quality and customer service — one commenter used the word "fraud" — encouraged Inman to talk to more users about their experience.

David LaVallee · Realtor at LaVallee RE

I'd had some closings and was looking to expand my lead gen so I signed up with SetSchedule after meeting them in person over a year ago and asking numerous questions about their methods. I was told I'd be paying for a service that spoke with people over the phone and actually set appointments with people that wanted to sell their homes. So far every single person I've contacted via this service had no idea who I was or why I was contacting them. Most of them were nice older people who said they had no intention of ever moving. At least with Zillow leads these people know why they're being con... See More

Set Schedule is a fraud. Not a single appointment in two months. Call and ask for a manager, and you're told that no one is available, but one will return your call. Call and ask for Roy Dekel (the owner) or Shayna Dekel (the broker), and a manager calls back a few days later offering lip service. The only part of their contract that they live up to is the section about charging the membership fee. These people are crooks.

Was marketed hard by them but emailed the link to their BBB reviews to the sales rep and I stopped getting calls.

Inman spoke on the phone to the two original commenters, Jarod Marcus and David LaVallee; as well as two agents selected from SetSchedule's Facebook page; and one agent who gave the product a four-star review on Yelp. The main concern brought up by these customers to Inman were related to lead quality and customer service.

"At first it sounded like it could be a good lead service, so I signed up, but they haven't performed at all," said Marcus to Inman in a phone interview. "I called multiple times to complain and kept being told I'd hear from a manager. Nothing. I tried calling the owner directly, Roy Dekel, and he was impossible to get a hold of."

LaVallee, who commented on the original review, told Inman he "...was grifted."

Coming from a technology background, LaVallee was confident the SetSchedule representatives knew what they were talking about, he told Inman. "Then I'd go on an appointment and no one knew why I was there," LaVallee said in a phone interview. "They were elderly, and with all respect, they'll likely die in that house. They sold the service as literally making appointments for us. It was bunk."

One SetSchedule customer, who was featured in a post on SetSchedule's Facebook page and asked to remain anonymous, at first told Inman he found the company to be “OK,” saying that he “... can’t say anything bad about them.” He didn’t have much interest in talking to Inman.

Then he called back.

“I looked in my records, I can’t find any deals from them,” the SetSchedule customer told Inman. “I paid $1,500 in December of 2017 for eight leads, and haven’t had one.”

Barbara Padilla, a Realtor with Berkshire Hathaway Home Services in Rancho Cucamonga, California, last year gave SetSchedule four-stars on Yelp.

Padilla was the only agent Inman spoke to who said he or she had closed a sale with a SetSchedule lead when asked. Before closing the sale, Padilla said the lead from her first appointment generated by SetSchedule had no interest in selling, while another had an agent in the family they were going to work with. She wondered what level of scrutiny was being applied to the leads she was paying for, which she said were sold to her as “ready to go.”

“It was sold to me as ‘go to the appointment, and the deal’s yours,’” Padilla told Inman. “It did start out great, but then, after I complained, they said they’d send me two free leads. If you speak to them, can you tell them they owe me those two leads?”

Inman also spoke with Brian Trainer, an agent with eXp Realty in Rocklin, California. He was also recently featured on SetSchedule’s Facebook page, and signed up for the product in January.

Trainer claims that after weeks of leaving voicemails with SetSchedule to address why his leads were so weak, he was told the company does not give refunds. He said he received six new leads immediately after that complaint. Four leads were unaware of why he was calling, according to Trainer. Another lead, "...an older gentleman, I may be able to close because I see him around our small town," Trainer said.

Trainer also says one of his leads called the police on him, believing he was a scam artist.

He spoke of several additional rounds of leaving voicemails and company promises to address lead quality. "I'm just going to eat my costs at this point," he said.

The SetSchedule app, reviewed by Inman Tuesday, is very new — it's been in beta for a year with 12,000 users; it will send invites to 10,000 agents in the coming weeks — and the agents we spoke to were using the company's lead services, which included phone, email and text messages services, available before the app. Roy Dekel, SetSchedule's founder, told Inman that the app will be better quality than the legacy system due to new data partnerships the company has in place, and that agents will have more control over the leads they choose to follow-up with.

"I'm aware of the problems with the legacy system and am doing all I can to fix it," Dekel said to Inman in a follow-up call after this article was published.

Inman also raised the service and lead quality issues with Dekel in the original interview.

"I want you to understand that we take every single bad comment extremely seriously and study them to improve," Dekel said. "The lashing out is really a derivative of an agent's inability to make money or get a refund if they don't don't get a commission."

The agents Inman spoke to agree that all leads take time to nurture, but at the heart of their collective ire is poor service when inquiring about lead quality.

"First off, we're opening an office in Phoenix, Arizona, that is going to have additional staff members and account executives for onboarding starter and premium members," Dekel told Inman.

"We have internal guidelines to create a better response, but we found in many instances of people who say 'I don't get responses for two weeks' are usually not that 100 percent accurate. But nevertheless we take them seriously, want to improve upon them, and that's why we're opening an additional office."

The appointment scheduling center is located in the Philippines, Dekel told Inman. The people in that office receive lead data and schedule appointments, but aren't trained to analyze leads, according to Dekel. SetSchedule also has about 30 customer service employees based in Irvine, California, headquarters, according to Dekel.

homeowners, and that agents have to follow-up.

“A lot of homeowners are interested in getting additional information, or home evaluations, or the potential for selling the house above their mortgage. There’s a lot of dynamics, and some of agents are having better experiences than others,” Dekel said.

Inman also asked Dekel about a particular lead forwarded to Inman by Trainer. The lead came with a phony email address and a phone number that landed in a call support center. The lead name was “Soy Un Hombre Calvo Y Sexy.”

“We’re now beta testing a home advisory team that will be on top of the success team,” Dekel told Inman. “It’s going to touch all inbound leads before they become outbound leads.”

During our research, Inman also found that Dekel was subject to a July 2017 SEC filing that barred him from the securities industry over “violations of the antifraud provisions of the securities laws.”

The ruling stated that from 2011 to 2013, Dekel misappropriated $3.29 million of investor funds as CEO of Diverse Financial Corp, of which he owned a 45 percent stake.

The filing states that instead of investing in life insurance premium finance lending operations as promised, "... Dekel and Diverse Financial misappropriated 100 percent of investors' monies using them, inter alia [among other things] for salaries, including Dekel's credit card bills, attorneys' fees related to conduct that predated DFCP and Ponzi-like payments to certain investors."

"It was a civil case that's been settled and closed, and had nothing to do with SetSchedule or the real estate industry," Dekel said when asked about the filing.

When asked what he would say to those unhappy with SetSchedule, Dekel said, "Call us. We will talk to every single agent who has any question or concern. Call 888-222-0011, option 2."

Dekel also noted that the company currently charges 30 percent for referral fees but is dropping it to 20 percent starting the week of April 15.

SetSchedule averages four out of five stars on Yelp. Its Facebook page boasts 894,000 likes (high for a small business — or any business, for that matter), while its Twitter account has over 6,300 followers. Inman inquired into whether SetSchedule has ever paid for likes and followers on social media, but Dekel said that none of SetSchedule's likes on Facebook, or followers on Twitter, are fake.

"I paid an upfront fee of $750 and haven't done any business with these people," Trainer told Inman in a follow-up interview. "I'm not happy to hear this happening to other agents, and I want the word out that they're crooks and hope they wither away into nothing."

Dekel told Inman in the follow-up call: "We're here to fix everything we didn't do right."
