We've all heard the complaints that real estate is slow to innovate and adapt when it comes to technology.

In a world where everyone is used to accessing answers immediately through on-demand services, the chasm between what's expected and real estate tech products that can integrate and provide a seamless customer experience is getting wider and wider.

Hacker Connect will focus on looking at these problems through the lens of the customer, with content that gives real estate technology developers, engineers, designers and IT directors a deep look into how these customer-centric problems can and are already being solved with practical examples.

On Tuesday, July 17, from 8 a.m. to 2:30 p.m., you'll learn from developers deeply involved in solving these problems, hear some of the challenges and, most importantly, understand the customer much more effectively.
